Introduction

Taxonomy

The genus Callithrix has a wide distribution and has historically been divided into three distinct groups of species: the argentata group, represented by marmosets from the Amazonian forest; the jacchus group, comprising marmosets from the Atlantic forest (Hershkovitz, 1977), and the pygmaea group made up of pygmy marmosets (C. pygmaea) from the Amazonian forest (Barroso et al., 1997). The pygmy marmoset was first classified as Cebuella Gray, 1866, a genus distinct from the already described Callithrix Erxleben, 1777. This taxonomic classification is supported by Rylands et al (2009), with further distinction into two separate subspecies, as also noted by Van Roosmalen & Van Roosmalen (1997). The western subspecies, Cebuella pygmaea pygmaea (Spix ,1823), is considered more yellow-bellied, while the eastern subspecies, Cebuella pygmaea niveiventris (Lonnberg,1940), is white bellied. Although a distribution distinction has been made, hence the western and eastern terminology, there is some variation within localities and more attention is needed to clearly understand the issue. Recent molecular data indicate that the pygmy marmoset should be classified as Callithrix pygmaea (Schneider et al., 1996; Barroso et al., 1997). Pygmy marmosets are more closely related to Amazonian than to Atlantic forest marmosets (Tagliaro et al., 2000). They are currently listed by ISIS and CITES as Callithrix pygmaea, and this classification is being used in this studbook. The North American population is being managed at the species level.

Natural History & Ecology

Pygmy marmosets are the smallest monkeys in the world, weighing an average of 110g for males and 122g for females, and measuring approximately 136 mm (5.35 in) (Soini 1988; Rowe 1996). They have brownish-gold fur with black ticking on their shoulders, backs, and heads, while their ventral fur is light yellow to white. Adult pygmy marmosets have tails that are longer than their bodies and marked with black rings. The fur on their faces sweeps back over their forehead and ears and they have two white marks on either side of their mouth and a white vertical line on their noses (Soini 1988). Infants are a brighter yellow color with black ticking over their bodies while the head is a dark grey with yellow fur on and around their ears. However, by the time they are a month old, their pelage is similar to an adult's (Soini 1988).

Most troops are composed of one dominant, reproductive female, a reproductive male, and the offspring from up to four litters. Groups may also contain additional adult males or females that are unrelated to the reproductive female, but these individuals do not reproduce. The reproductive female is dominant over all group members while the breeding male is dominant over all males in the group. Among the offspring, the older siblings are dominant over the younger siblings except for dependent infants, as they are not part of the dominance hierarchy (Soini 1988). The breeding female in the group produces twins, as with other callitrichids, twice a year after a gestation period of approximately 4.5 months, and the adult males and other group members help her to carry them (Soini 1988). Infants weight between 14 and 27g at birth. The infants start to move independently at about two months of age and are weaned by three months old. Juveniles begin carrying younger offspring when they are approximately six months coinciding with the time the female is likely to give birth to a new set of offspring. Pygmy marmosets become sexually mature by the time they reach 15 to 18 months of age. Rather than beginning to mate when they reach puberty, pygmy marmoset females are reproductively suppressed when they remain in their natal groups (Carlson et al. 1997). Pygmy marmosets live an average of 12 years in the wild, with some individuals reaching their early twenties in captivity.

The pair bond may be strengthened by social and sexual behaviors between the male and female both during and outside ovulation, and especially in pairs that experience the loss of offspring (Carlson et al., 1996). Although there do not appear to be observable signs of ovulation in pygmy marmosets, males pay more attention to the scent-markings of females and females may exhibit less aggression towards their mate during ovulation (Converse et al., 1995). Behavioral signs may therefore serve as indicators of ovulation in this species. Pygmy marmosets use vocalizations to recognize group members. There are three important calls used by pygmy marmosets: "trills," and contact calls comprised of "J-calls," and "long calls". There are distinctive acoustic features in each of two contact calls by which individuals could be distinguished from each other and individual pygmy marmosets have been shown to respond differently depending on which type of contact call was given and on the identity of the vocalizing animal (Snowdon & Cleveland, 1980). Vocalizations may also help with pair bonding, and individuals modify the structure of their trill vocalizations in response to pairing with a new mate (Snowdon & Elowson, 2001).

Pygmy marmosets exhibit squirrel-like patterns of locomotion, including running quadrupedally up and down tree trunks, vertically clinging to tree trunks as they feed on sap, and running on both the top and underside surfaces of horizontal substrates. Pygmy marmosets can leap up to five meters (Rowe 1996; Kinzey 1997). They are also able to turn their heads 180 degrees, an adaptation which allows them to scan the environment for predators while vertically clinging to a tree (Kinzey 1997). Pygmy marmosets have long, sharp, claw-like nails which are different from the flat nails seen in other primates, including humans, and are probably an adaptation to a life spent clinging to trees (Kinzey 1997). They are exudativore -insectivores and spend the majority of their time gouging holes into trees or vines with their sharp lower teeth and then eating the gum, sap, resin, or latex that is exuded (Soini 1988). Their lower incisors are long and narrow with the five teeth in the front and center of the lower jaw all being the same length. This helps them gnaw into trees efficiently and stimulates sap flow (Sussman 2000). They also have an enlarged cecum which allows extended time for the breakdown of plant gums (Sussman 2000). While 60 to 80% of their total feeding time is spent on exudates, they spend between 12 and 16% on insects, and supplement their diet with fruits, buds, flowers, nectars, and very occasionally small lizards (Soini 1988; Yépez et al. 2005).

Pygmy marmosets occupy mature evergreen forests occurring in and at the edges of periodically inundated river floodplains. They are habitat specialists that prefer areas with no more than two or three meters of standing water for more than three months out of the year and are found in highest densities in river-edge forests (Soini 1988). Wild pygmy marmoset groups utilize a primary exudate tree in their home range until the exudate yield declines at which time they gradually move to a new area (Ramirez et al. 1977; Soini 1988). Home ranges of neighboring groups do not overlap and there are few, if any, interactions between groups. Because of their extremely small body size, pygmy marmosets are subject to predation by small felids, raptors, and climbing snakes. In some cases, they will exhibit mobbing behavior in which the entire group flocks to an intruder, loudly vocalizing and attacking it until it retreats. Other times, they remain frozen until the threat passes (Soini 1988; Kinzey 1997).

Range & Conservation Status

Pygmy marmosets are found in Bolivia, Brazil, Columbian, Ecuador, and Peru. They range over a large area and the subspecies are isolated by geographic barriers which include several large rivers. The western subspecies, C. p. pygmaea, is found in the state of Amazonas, Brazil, southern Colombia, northern Bolivia, northeastern Ecuador, and eastern Peru (van Roosmalen 1997; Yépez et al. 2005). Its range is bound by the Rio Solimões and Rio Caquetá. C. p. niveiventris is found in eastern Peru and Amazonas, Brazil south of the Rio Solimões and north of the Rio Purus. It extends as far east as the Rio Madeira and is bound in the west by the Andes (van Roosmalen 1997; Groves 2001).

The species is listed as Least Concern due to its relatively wide distribution range, being fairly common, and the lack of major threats resulting in a significant population decline. However, it may be undergoing some localized declines in parts of its range, due mainly to habitat loss. As pygmy marmosets are dependent on exudate tree species, habitat destruction and logging specifically can have a significant and rapid impact on their survival. Individual populations have exhibited preferences for specific tree species, regardless of abundance (Yepez, de la Torre, & Snowdon, 2005). It is critically important to take this into consideration when making recommendations for tree species protection, as data from one area may not apply to others for pygmy marmoset survival. This species is also affected by tourist activity with reductions in social play, rates of vocalization and in the use of the lower stratum of the forests seen in areas experiencing tourism pressure (de la Torre, Snowdon, & Bejarano, 2000). The pet trade has also caused a decline in some populations.

Studbook Scope

The Pygmy Marmoset Studbook documents both the historical and current population of pygmy marmosets in North American institutions through March 10, 2013. The historical population contains 707.661.363 (1731) at 144 Institutions. There are currently 60.38.8 (106) living at 18 Institutions within North America.

Data Fields:

Studbook Number – unique, permanent, number assigned to each individual in the studbook.

Birth Date – indicates the date of the animal's hatch.

Birth Date Estimate – indicates whether the hatch date is an estimate.

None = No estimation

Day = Day is estimated

Month = Month is estimated

Year = the actual hatch date is within the year of the Hatch Date field.

+/- range = estimation is based on information provided by holding institution

Sire/Dam -

Numbers indicate the studbook number of the parents of captive born animals.

Wild indicates that animal was wild caught and its parents are unknown wild individuals.

UNK indicates the animal was captive born, but its parents are not known.

MULT indicates there are several possible parents. Possible parents are listed in the parental assumptions note.

Sex – male, female, or unknown.

Event – documents the movements of the animal. This includes Birth, Wild Capture, Transfer, Death, Lost To Follow up.

Location – indicates where the event took place.

Local ID – the number assigned to the individual by the institution where the event took place. Unknown indicates that no ID was assigned, or is not known. Local ID of none is assigned for event locations including wild and unknown dealers.

Date – indicates when the event occurred.

Date Estimate – indicates whether the date field is an estimate.

None = No estimation

Day = Day is estimated

Month = Month is estimated

Year = the actual event date is within the year of the Event Date field.

+/- range = indicates the estimated time frame of an event

Conventions:

This studbook includes the following assumptions and estimates for data entered as of August 2008:

Date conventions:

Wild caught animals with a birth date estimated to the year are given the birth date July 1 +/- 6 months of that year unless other information is provided by the reporting institution.

Year estimates are typically set to January first of that year unless wild birth with year noted as estimation.

Month estimates are set to the first day of that month with month noted as estimation.

Biological conventions:

Wild caught animals are assumed to have a rearing type of Parent

Wild caught animals are assumed to have unknown parents not included in the studbook

Wild caught animals are all assumed to be unrelated to each other
