INTRODUCTION

The formation of the North American Regional Studbook for Saddle-billed storks, Ephippiorhynchus senegalensis, was approved by the WCMC (Wildlife Conservation and Management Committee) and the American Zoological Association's Ciconiiformes Taxon Advisory Group in January 2001.

This Historical studbook documents all saddle-billed storks confirmed to have lived in the North American region as reported by individual institutions at the time of publication. There are 268 individuals recorded in this studbook. Also included in the studbook is a listing of living individuals sorted by holding institution. There are currently 73 living individuals.

The North American region includes the United States, Canada, Mexico, and the Caribbean, but saddle-billed storks have historically only been held in the United States and Canada.

Saddle-billed storks are usually captured as juveniles, but occasionally some adult birds are captured. For this reason, except in the case of birds that are listed as "juvenile" at the time of arrival at an institution, unless an institution estimates the age of the specimen, the hatch date is listed as unknown.

Saddle-billed storks obtain their full adult plumage around three years of age. For birds that were listed as "juvenile" or "immature" at the time of arrival at a specific institution, average age is assumed to be 18 months unless a facility provided information otherwise. Thus, the hatch date for these juvenile birds will be listed as 18 months prior to transfer to the institution.

Saddle-billed storks are not known to have reproduced in captivity worldwide until 1994. Thus, any birds with unknown birth locations and unknown parentage that arrived at institutions prior to 1994 are assumed to be wild-caught.

All specimens considered to be wild-caught with unknown capture locations are assumed to have been caught in the African region, as this species is exclusively African.

Common names around the world of the saddle-billed stork include Senegal jabiru, zadelbekooievaar, Afrikan sattlestorch, Saddle-stork, African Jabiru, and saddelnaebs stork.

Studbook 215 was found to be an infertile egg and was deleted from the studbook. The number will not be reused.

THE NATURAL HISTORY OF THE SADDLE-BILLED STORK

Identification

The saddle-billed stork is one of the tallest stork species, reaching a height of up to 1.3 meters. The head, neck and wings are black, with all other plumage white. At the center of the breast is a small, oval shaped patch of bare, red skin that is usually exposed but can be obscured by feathers. This patch of skin may be darker or more distinct during the breeding season. Their most striking feature is the bill, which is crimson with a dark band around the center and a striking yellow fleshy area at the base of the upper bill, the "saddle." One or both members of a pair often have small yellow or red wattles that hang down 15-33mm below the base of the lower bill and form the "stirrups" for the saddle. Legs are black with red hock joints and feet. Males are larger, around 6 kg., with dark eyes while the females are slightly smaller, around 5 kg., with yellow eyes. Like all stork species, they lack a syrinx, and are silent except for bill clattering which they do frequently during copulations or as warnings to intruders.

Newly hatched young are gray with dark eyes and short dark beaks, and although lacking adult coloration, the "saddle" on the bill is evident and usually surrounded by downy feathers. Juvenile birds are generally gray with dark wing feathers and legs, and have been confused with the young of other species of storks such as the yellow-billed stork. (Hancock, Kushlan, and Kahl 1992, p 116.)

Saddle-billed storks are one of 17 species of storks, of the Family Ciconiidae, of the Order Ciconiiformes which is made up of mostly long-necked, long-legged wading birds. They are closely related to the black-necked stork, Ephippiorhynchus asiaticus, which shares the same Genus.

Distribution and Movements

Saddle-billed storks occur throughout tropical Africa, from Senegal to Sudan and Ethiopia, south to northern South Africa, frequenting large-scale water areas.

They appear to be sedentary, with no evidence of regular long-distance migration. They can be somewhat nomadic especially in response to drought or flood conditions.

Diet

Saddle-billed storks are opportunistic and carnivorous, feeding in wet areas, such as rivers, streams, marshes, and lakes. They consume fish, amphibians, crabs, shrimps, snails, reptiles, small rodents or other small vertebrates, and insects. There are some reports of saddle-billed storks eating carrion. (Hancock, Kushlan, and Kahl 1992, p117) They can consume fish as large as 1300g. Foraging is diurnal.

Mating and Social Structure

Saddle-billed storks are highly territorial and are usually found solitarily, in pairs, or in small family groups consisting of parents and recently fledged offspring. It is believed that they are generally monogamous, with some pair bonds lasting for years.

Their breeding display consists of running short distances, jumping, and pirouetting with wings spread. This is called the Flap-Dash display and may be performed by either the male or female or both together. Breeding displays may gradually diminish the longer a pair is together.

Saddle-billed storks build large stick nests, usually at the top of a tall tree, near water. In most pairs the male does the majority of the nest building, with the female seemingly supervising building activities, throwing out what she doesn't like. Clutch size is 1-5, normally 2-3, pale blue to white eggs, with a 32 day incubation period. The Toledo Zoo and Audubon Species Survival Center have both reported incubation periods as long as 38 days. Both parents incubate the eggs and protect the nest area. Young are altricial, and parents feed the young by regurgitating food items onto the floor of the nest, which the nestlings pick up and swallow. Water is brought to the nest and regurgitated over the chicks for cooling. The chicks often drink this water as it flows out of the parents' mouths. Generally two offspring, more rarely three, will fledge the nest at 58 to 100 days old.

Offspring maintain their juvenile plumage and eye color until about 3 years of age when they achieve adult plumage and sexual maturity.

HISTORY OF THE CAPTIVE POPULATION

Saddle-billed storks have been held in captivity in the North American region since 1928 when two birds, a male and an individual of unknown sex were brought to the Philadelphia Zoo. Importations from that point were sporadic until the 1960's with the largest importations of birds occurring in the late 1980's and early 1990's.

Successful reproduction of this species world wide did not occur until 1994 when the Dallas Zoo hatched its first chick, a male. The Dallas Zoo continued to be the only zoo to reproduce this species until 1999 when the Audubon Species Survival Center hatched its first chick. Below are first time successful reproductions for other institutions since 1999:

Toledo Zoo - 2000.

San Diego Zoo Safari Park -2001

Kansas City Zoo - 2003.

Jacksonville Zoo - 2004.

Fort Worth Zoo - 2007.

Disney's Animal Kingdom -2013.

Successful reproduction occurred during the reporting period this year from San Diego Safari Park and Disney's Animal Kingdom.

Total population numbers decreased from 75 to 73 birds due to multiple adult deaths despite three successful hatches. Overall breeding remains low.

It is notable that up until 2013 chicks have only been produced by pairs with non-pinioned, fully-flighted males, both first and second generation breeding. For the first time a successful hatch occurred from a pinioned male at Disney's Animal Kingdom in February of 2013. This male, and his pinioned mate, had produced fertile eggs prior to this but no successful hatches.
